These numbers aren't just arbitrary; they're calculated based on market data, repair quality, and the car's pre-accident condition. It's a stark reminder that the impact of an accident extends beyond the immediate costs of repairs.

Regardless of fault, the reality is that your vehicle's value has taken a hit. Wondering how much it has depreciated due to the collision? We've got your back!

The Hidden Loss

This drop in value is known as diminished value, and it's a concept that many car owners are painfully unaware of until they're directly affected. The loss isn't just theoretical; it affects the actual cash value of your vehicle on the market. Whether you were at fault in the accident or not, your car has undeniably lost part of its worth—a loss that won't just disappear over time.

The story doesn't end at the repair shop. In fact, that's just the beginning. Even after your car is fixed and looks as good as new, the history of the accident follows it like a shadow, influencing potential buyers' perceptions and decisions. This is the unseen impact of an accident, a silent devaluer that can significantly affect your car's market value and your financial position.

The Calculation Behind the Scenes

How do we arrive at these diminished value figures? It's not arbitrary. Experts analyze comprehensive market data, taking into account the quality of repairs and the vehicle's condition before the accident.

They examine how similar vehicles perform in the market, adjusting for factors like make, model, year, and mileage. This method ensures that the calculated diminished value is as accurate as possible, reflecting the real-world impact of the accident on your vehicle's value.
